Background and Rationale of the SEMINAR

In the 21st century, globalization has profoundly reshaped democratic systems and multicultural societies. The rise of populism, new forms of nationalism, and socio-economic inequalities challenge the traditional understanding of democracy. Simultaneously, multiculturalism—manifested through migration, identity politics, language, literature, and cultural rights—demands fresh approaches to governance and citizenship. This seminar seeks to create an interdisciplinary dialogue that explores the intersections of politics, history, sociology, law, economics, media, literature, and geography in understanding democracy's challenges and opportunities in a globalized and multicultural world. It will provide a platform for scholars, students, and practitioners to reflect upon past struggles, present realities, and future pathways for inclusive democratic governance.

TARGET PARTICIPANTS

- Faculty, Research Scholars, and Students of Political Science, History, Sociology, Economics, Law, Literature, Media, and Geography.
- Policy practitioners, lawyers, journalists, civil society activists, and NGOs working on democracy, human rights, and multicultural issues.
- Government officials and representatives from international organizations and think tanks.
- General citizens interested in democracy, governance, and social justice.

EXPECTED OUTCOMES

- Enhanced understanding of the intersections between democracy, multiculturalism, and globalization from multiple disciplinary perspectives.
- Scholarly discussions leading to innovative frameworks for addressing contemporary challenges such as inequality, migration, nationalism, and media influence.
- Strengthened academic and policy linkages for promoting inclusive, participatory, and sustainable democratic practices.
- Publication of selected seminar papers in an edited volume or journal to disseminate the outcomes widely.
- Development of recommendations that can guide policymakers, educators, and civil society actors in strengthening democratic institutions in multicultural contexts.

OBJECTIVES OF THE SEMINAR

- To examine the impact of globalization on sovereignty, governance, and democratic institutions.
- To encourage policy-oriented and academic dialogue for strengthening democratic values in India and the global context.
- To explore multiculturalism as a challenge and opportunity for democratic societies.
- To analyze historical and contemporary struggles for equality, rights, and democratic participation.
- To engage with interdisciplinary perspectives linking politics, economy, law, literature, media, and culture.
